The Kent and Essex toads were the only ones passable beyond a few miles from London. The western coaches came to a stop in various places. The Windsor coach was lugged through sixteen feet of snow at Colnby fifty labourers, and then, punicstricken, stuck fast. In Maidenhead lane the snow had doubled its first depth, and between Twyford and Reading it had drifted into mountains. As to Bugshot-heath, the conchmen refused to attempt its alpine terrors. Nothing moved on the north road after the Newcastle coach got off the track and fell into a pit eight feet deep-without, however, hurting anybody. Trembling boots and shuddering ostlers renorted that the Exeter and Cheshire mails were lost, every one frozen to death; and there was a flying legend that the Portsmouth Highlyer had julted down the Devil's Punchbowl. By the end of January the silent power of the frost had gradually closed in upon the great Dining Room of the same size, two Parlours, a on moderate terms, river that brings the wealth of the world to Lon- Storeroom and Bathroom. That great artery of the commerce of the four quarters of the globe had reased to ebb and The systole and diastole of England's heart had for a time stopped. The wonder and delight of the Londoners was unbounded. The fact was at once utilised for pleasure and busi-ness. The great frost fair of the old times was revived at Queenbithe and Chiswick, and once more between the bridges meat was cooked and verses were printed. The cold was a good social excuse for the glass, and those who used it made good use of the excuse. The coloured flars of all nations fluttered in the cold air from the roofs of countless booths, where a licence reigned forbidden on shore. The papers described it "Bands of pandean minstrels, relieved by the dulect strains of the tin trumpet on all sides, delighted the car. In the centre of the river a nairow stream defied the power of the frozen region, and marked the nath where once the current ran.' This interruption, however, so far lings situated between the Agra Bank and Compfrom impeding the gambols of the day, increased the sport, and added to the profit of the stewards of the scene. A few small planks in some cases, principal building is very suitable for division and an old boat or two in others, with the simple addition of Charon's fare, kept the communication entire, and enlivened the pastino. In some parts of the stream, where the width of unfrozen water admitted it boats completely bent for sail; with their full equipment, attracted the heedless throng. In these were placed food for the hingry: and for the thirsty relief; gin and gingerbread, with other cordials, were here on sale at a moderate price. 'Ubi mel, ibi apes.' The crowd poured towards this magnetic point with extraordinary avidity. Men. women, and children were often seen in one promisenous heap, although it was impossible not to feel anxious to afford every opportunity of cheering by playful pastime the nipping severity of the weather; yet we can-not disengage our mind from the hazardons consequences of such an exhibition as we are now noticing. Between the bridges the river is now entirely covered, not with a regular even frozen surface, but with an incongruous accumulation of any fragments and congested piled snow. CARANITE GODOWNS at Wanchat, having which, during the partial thaw, was disengaged in the river and floated downwards; this having CANAJER & Co. been interrupted by the intervention of the birdges, and partially re-united by the frost of the last two or three days, has completely covered the surface of the water. It is yet extremely, dangerous and was in many places last night set in motion by the influx of the tide, and car ried with extreme velocity against the piers of the bridges. Some waterman, more foolbardy than others, ventured to cross opposite Templemardens, and nearly lost his life in the attempt."
While the crowd danced and blew trumpets. sprang rattles drank gin, and ate gingerbread, scientific men disputed whether the ic rese and fell in one solid mass with the ebb and flow, or whether it remained steady at the
